What happens when a child is not brought to their appointment?

Information for children, parents and carers

This leaflet explains the Local Safeguarding Children Board's guidance we follow when a child is not brought to their health appointment.

Why is it a concern when a child is not brought to their appointment?

When a child is not brought to their appointment it can be because parents or carers have forgotten or the child has multiple appointments which are difficult to co-ordinate. It may also be because you have not been given enough information about the appointment.

When a child misses an appointment, professionals must always consider the impact on a child's overall health and wellbeing.

Missed health appointments are sometimes a factor in cases when a child has come to harm, for example in cases where children have suffered from neglect.

What should I do if I can't bring the child to their appointment?

Tell us as soon as possible if you are unable to bring the child to their appointment. We can give you another appointment at a more convenient time.

What happens if the child is not brought to their appointment?

We may contact you to ask why the child was not brought to their appointment, and offer another appointment if appropriate.

We may also contact other health professionals involved in the child's care.

If there have been previous missed appointments, and we have concerns about the impact on your child's health and wellbeing or the child has a Social Worker, then we may speak to other professionals regarding the child's care, including Children's Services.

This may be to either request some additional support for the child/family or to share our concerns about the impact of the missed appointments on the child.
